What is a resume?

If truth be told, your resume is more of an advertisement about you. It gives your prospective employers an overview of your qualifications, your experience and your strengths. It is after gauging this document that they decide whether you are suited for a particular job opening or not.

Your resume needs to speak volumes about you. When looking for a job, this is the first thing that your prospective employers see to get to know you better.

Opening Statements of the resume

When starting to design the resume, you need to start with a catchy title that would summarize your professional skills and immediately grabs the attention of the screening team in the organization. Make sure it is not superfluous and avoid exaggerations, as companies generally do not fall for such things.

Follow the title with a summary statement which highlights your strengths and gives a clear picture of what career goals you have. Try to sum everything up in three or four lines, as it is easier to scan through.

Structure of a resume

Once you have the resume title in place and have put in a well-thought out summary statement, you need to add in all the other important information about yourself:

- ✓ Start by adding your name and your contact details. This should include your home address, phone number and email.
- ✓ Include details of extracurricular activities you are interested in, if they apply to your professional goals.
- ✓ Educational qualifications should be listed from your most recent to the oldest.
- ✓ Work experience should also be listed with the most recent position first. Include your responsibilities and the skills you acquired.
- ✓ Don't forget to include linguistic abilities, conferences and workshops attended, speaking engagements, and professionals publications you may have.

Important elements

When writing a resume, make sure you do not get too carried away. Keep the design as simple as possible. A complicated layout can be confusing and may put off the prospective employers. Do not go for superfluous fonts to write in the details. The ideal fonts for resumes are Times New Roman, Verdana or Arial. Also, make sure to stick to font size 10 or 12 as this makes for a professional look and is easy to read.

The length of the resume matters too. It should not exceed more than two pages, as this may get boring for the employers when screening it. Generally, the screening team looks for only relevant information and is not interested in anything that doesn't count. Most people still stick to the belief that a resume should be a single page, so make sure you know what is expected in your industry.

Things to avoid

While writing a resume, you may feel tempted to lie, or stretch the truth, about your abilities. This is not a good idea. Sooner or later your employers may find out about this, which can lead to loss of your credibility in the company.

Writing in first person or adding unfamiliar abbreviations should be avoided when writing your resume.

A resume should be concise and the same time should have a consistent tone. It should be tailor made to suit the job for which you are applying. Before forwarding a resume, make sure to go through it a number of times to ensure that there are no mistakes.

Tips For Writing A Resume:

- Take out the objective. Seeing that you're already applying for the job, it should be obvious you want it. You can cover your desire for the role in your cover letter, or if you're changing industries, it may be useful to include a brief introductory summary in the resume.
- Brief is best. While you may have aced making milkshakes at the cafe you worked for in high school, it's time to get rid of that clutter if it's not related to the role you want to pursue now. Give more space to detail about your current or recent jobs and less about the past. If it doesn't fit on one to two pages - it's not worth writing about! Make sure you include specific skills that are relevant to the job you're applying for, even if that means adjusting your resume for each new application.

- Take a pass on unnecessary info. That includes your age, marital status, religion or nationality. This might have been the standard in the past, but all of this information is now illegal for your employer to ask you, and there's no need to include it. For security reasons we suggest that you don't include your date of birth, and definitely not your bank account details. As for an address, a suburb and postcode will suffice.
- Make it clear and straightforward. Use simple text in one modern, standard font that is easy to read, and that everyone can understand. As everything in your resume is about your experiences, avoid writing in first or third person. For example, instead of writing "I managed a team of three", or "Sarah managed a team of three" rather write "responsible for managing a team of 3" in concise bullet points below headlines where necessary.
- Be professional and discreet. You may still be using the same email address that you set up when Hotmail came about in the 90's, but if it's anything that looks unprofessional, it might be worth your while setting up a new one for the purpose of your job applications. Avoid using your current work email address, or phone number for that matter, unless you want to get yourself into trouble!
- Keep to the employer's submission requirements. Above all, you won't get noticed if you don't follow all of the specific requirements that have been instructed in the job description. Often both resumes and cover letters are requested in a certain file format (doc, pdf, docx, rtt). Sometimes advertisements request applications be sent or addressed in a particular way. Adhere to these, and you'll be one step ahead of any other applicants who didn't bother to tune into this detail!

Avoid using cluttered or complicated layouts with headers, footers, tables or other items that may not look right when viewed on different computers with varying software versions.
